Peer Support Provisions of Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act (HR 2646)

Talking to someone who has been what you have been through ("peer-support") can sometimes make people feel better. Peer support is generously funded by states and SAMHSA, but research does not show it improves meaningful outcomes in people with serious mental illness. ((Dixon, Perkins and Calmes September 2009) (Cochrane Collaborative 2013) (Lloyd-Evans, Mayo-Wilson and Harrison 2014) (Landers and Zhou 2014) (SAMHSA-BRSS 2012).

While peer-support may be enjoyable to give and receive, the organizations that receive peer support funds often use the funds to promote an anti-medication, anti-psychiatry philosophy, and lobby against treatments (hospitals, AOT, ECT, etc.) that can help the most seriously ill. Ex. the National Coalition for Mental Health Recovery (NCMHR) believes diagnosis is not of value in helping people recover, and works to replace medical model with a talk model they helped to invent.

The Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act attempts to reign in the excesses of peer support by setting up what will essentially become a credentialing mechanism that requires those engaged in the practice to understand science, the utility of medications and other aspects. Some think this is a good idea. Others are worried that the bill essentially credentials an intervention without evidence it is effective. They would prefer to see a two-step process. Government should first determine if peer support is effective at improving meaningful outcomes like reducing homelessness, arrest, incarceration, hospitalization and suicide; and if so, after that, establish best practices. It is hard to argue against determining if an intervention is effective before taking steps to spread its usage.

Following is the important section of Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act related to peer support.
